STOP THE DRIFT

5 prompts that stop your AI character falling apart.

The fastest fix for drift. Copy, paste, keep the same face every time.

READ THIS FIRST

The thing that kills most AI characters is drift.

You make a great face on Monday. You come back on Tuesday, and the AI hands you a stranger. The nose is a bit different. The jaw's changed. Close, but not her.

That slow change is called drift, and it's why most AI characters fall apart after a few posts. The good news: most drift comes from a handful of small mistakes, and each one has a quick fix.

Here are five prompts and habits that stop it. Use them today. They won't teach you the whole system, that's the full method, but they'll fix the most common ways a character slips, and you'll see the difference on your very next image.

One rule underneath all five: once you've settled on your character, you stop describing her from scratch and start pointing back to the same saved reference. Every fix below is a version of that one idea.

Five prompts that hold her steady

1 Write her once, reuse forever

Vague descriptions drift. A fixed, specific description you paste every time does not. Write hers once and never reword it.

PASTE THIS SHAPE, FILLED WITH YOUR CHARACTER

Photorealistic portrait of a [age] woman, [skin tone] skin with a [finish], [face shape] face, [cheekbones], [lips], [eyes], [brows], [one fixed hairstyle], [one signature accessory]. Same face every image.

2 Give her one thing that never changes

Your eye latches onto a small constant detail and reads "same person" before it even checks the face. Pick one and keep it identical.

ADD THIS TO EVERY PROMPT

...always wearing the same small gold hoop earrings and one thin gold chain, the same [hairstyle]. These never change.

3 Lock her to a reference, not to words

The single biggest fix. Once you have a face you like, feed that image back in as a saved character so every new image is built from her, not typed from scratch.

THE INSTRUCTION THAT STOPS THE DICE-ROLL

Use the attached reference image as the exact character. Keep her face, hair and features identical. Only change the scene and pose.

4

Give her one room to live in

A recognisable room does half the work for free. When the setting is the same, the whole image reads as "same person, same life," even before the face is checked.

KEEP A FIXED SET BLOCK AND PASTE IT EVERY TIME

...in the same room every time: [one hero feature, e.g. fluted oak wall], [fixed light], [fixed palette], [two or three recurring objects]. Calm, uncluttered.

5

Keep her clothes plain

Busy patterns and logos come out different every single time, so they drift the worst. A calm, plain wardrobe reads as a real person with taste and stays consistent.

ADD THIS CONSTRAINT

...wearing quiet, plain clothing in a fixed palette of [colours]. No busy patterns, no logos, no prints.

The 10-second check before you post

Put your new image next to your original reference. Same face? Same hair? Same room? If anything moved, regenerate. Never post a "close enough" one, close enough is how a following stops believing her.

WHEN YOU'RE READY FOR THE WHOLE THING

These five fix drift. The full method builds a business.

The prompts here stop your character slipping. The complete method goes further: the four locks in full, the voice, the one-room set, the posting recipe that lets you run her like a machine, and the way it all turns into a following that doesn't know she isn't real.

That's The Phantom Influencer. The woman on this page, Amy, is built entirely with it. She isn't real. You'd never know.
